○ It's on the table now. Not facing the wall.

Elif points at an old black-and-white photo of a young woman in front of a green door.

▲ Grandma, who's that young woman?

○ That's me! I was young here. I was twenty-two.

▲ You? You were very beautiful!

○ I was. And I still am!

■ And who's that tall man?

○ My husband. Elif, that's your grandfather.

▲ Grandpa was no longer alive when I was a baby.

○ Yes. He was a very good person. Like you, Elif.

■ Where were you here?

○ By the river. It was August. We were young and happy.

The next photo shows an old house with a green door and dark, empty windows.

○ And this is number 7. It was very old and empty.

○ It was my husband's parents' house.

○ His parents were old, and the house was too big for them.

○ Not too big for us. Now it's mine. For fifty years now.

▲ Fifty years? Like my mum's brother!

On the next photo: a school yard full of children, and at the side, a young teacher.

■ And here? So many children!

○ This is my school. I was a teacher. For forty years!

■ So they're all your children?

○ Not mine, the school's children. But they were all mine. Half the town!

A small colour photo: a girl of seven with long light-brown hair and a big smile.

Ayşe takes two small photos out of her cardigan pocket.

○ Elif, this is for you. Your grandpa and me, by the river.

▲ For me? Thank you, Grandma!

○ And this is for you. Number 7, when it was empty.

○ And you? Where were you when you were ten?

■ In Hamburg. My birthplace is Hamburg. My parents are still there.

Tekir jumps onto the shelf and sits down in front of the wall, between the photos.

○ Tekir's? He's not my cat!

▲ But he's always here. He's family too!

○ All right. Elif, please draw Tekir.

▲ I can! In my new sketchbook!

That evening, a bright yellow page hangs among the old photos.

Now Ayşe's whole family is on the wall. And Tekir.
